Provenance

This collection was created from materials from multiple sources. However, the core of the collection was created by Daphene R. McFerren, the daughter of John and Viola McFerren, who, in 1995, received a summer grant from National Endowment for the Humanities to create a collection on the Fayette County Movement.

Minnie Harris Jameson, the League's secretary for approximately 45 years (from 1959 to 2004) both created and acquired materials chronicling the Movement as it unfolded from 1959.

The following individuals also donated materials on the Movement:

- Baxton Bryant (former executive director, Tennessee Council on Human Relations)
- Vicki Gabriner (Cornell University student activist)
- Tim Hall (Cornell University student activist)
- Robert Hamburger (University of Chicago student activist)
- Dean Hansell (Fayette County/Haywood County Work Camp activist)
- Rowena Haynie (spouse of Charles Haynie, Cornell University student activist)
- Richard Saunders (researcher/archivist at University of Tennessee at Martin, PhD dissertation on Fayette County)
- Ruth Perry (Cornell University student activist)
- Stuart Mitchell (Cornell University student activist)
- Tita Beal

As the existence of the collection became known to a broader community, including former civil rights activists, materials have been donated and continue to be added to the collection.

Historical Sketch

In 1959, African Americans in Fayette County, Tennessee, demanded the right to register and vote. They had been effectively barred from this civil process since Reconstruction. However, the trial of Burton Dodson ignited a determined resolve in the African American community to register and vote so they could help shape the social, political, economic and educational spheres of their lives. In 1940, Burton Dodson, an African American man, fled Fayette County following an attack by a white lynch mob at his house. In 1959, approximately 19 years later, Dodson was extradited from East St. Louis, Illinois, back to Tennessee to face trial for the murder of one of the white men in that lynch mob.

John Estes, an African American attorney from Memphis, represented Dodson at trial and learned that because almost no African Americans were registered to vote, few could serve as jurors. Estes then enlisted John McFerren and Harpman Jameson, World War II veterans whose families had lived in Fayette County for generations, to spearhead a voter registration drive in Fayette County. As early as the summer in 1959, McFerren and Jameson were successful in their initial efforts to register African Americans. However, the increased efforts by African Americans in Fayette County to register and vote were met with swift retaliation by whites, including massive evictions by white landowners of African American families who had sharecropped for years on the farms of white landowners. The first eviction took place as early as the fall of 1959 when the family of Early B. and Mary Williams were evicted from the Leatherwood farm for registering to vote. Additionally, African Americans who registered were boycotted by white merchants, store clerks, bankers, and doctors in Fayette County who refused to sell them basic goods and/or provide African American services.

Despite these and other severe hardships, the African American community organized to support an aggressive civil rights agenda throughout the 1960s. From this struggle emerged its local leadership. As described in this extensive collection, many other African Americans in Fayette County provided crucial leadership or support to sustain the Fayette County movement. Two such leaders were Viola Harris McFerren and Minnie Harris Jameson, sisters and the spouses of John McFerren and Harpman Jameson respectively. They played a pivotal role in organizing and leading the League's boycotts, demonstration marches, and voter registration efforts

As early as 1959, movement leaders created the organization, The Original Fayette County Civic and Welfare League. Inc., and under its umbrella created strategies and implemented tactics to achieve their goals of racial equality. Tactics included demonstrations, boycotts, sit-ins to integrate public facilities, demand for access to employment and other opportunities, and assistance from the courts to integrate public schools.

The relationship between local African American activists and civil rights workers, many of whom were white, from across the nation was especially unique. The local dynamic, charismatic and effective African American leadership maintained control of their movement by creating and executing strategies and tactics to advance the cause for civil rights in Fayette County, while also effectively collaborating with civil rights activists from outside of Fayette County.

While other parts of the nation had turned their attention to other pressing matters of the day, including the Vietnam War, activists in Fayette County continued their struggle for racial equality. In 1969, an article by the New York Times described the Fayette County Movement as one of the longest "sustained civil rights protest in the United States."

This collection chronicles the contributions of this unique and special movement. For video and other information about the Fayette County, Tennessee, Civil Rights Movement, please visit www.memphis.edu/tentcity.
