Administrative history

Stereographs, an early form of three-dimensional photograph, were a major vehicle for popular education and entertainment in the latter part of the nineteenth century. Stereographs were also used for journalistic reporting on many of the current events of the period: parades, disasters, and political events. The Civil War and the Spanish-American War are also documented on stereocards with textual commentary. The stereograph, otherwise known as the stereogram, stereoptican, or stereo view, were two almost identical photographs placed on cardboard side by side, to be viewed with a stereoscope. When viewed through a stereoscope, the photograph appeared three-dimensional. The author Oliver Wendell Holmes invented an affordable stereo viewer for the American market.

Stereography, from the outset, was a commercial success. Entrepreneurs often re-used images without giving proper credit to the photographer. The cards were in such demand that many believed libraries devoted exclusively to stereographic images would have to be constructed. It was a democratic invention because the photographs reached across class lines, and were affordable even to the poor and lower middle class. Many displayed views of far-away lands, making the travel experience, through photography, available to the general population. Its affordability and availability made stereography a widespread phenomenon spanning over sixty years. They became a popular photographic medium in Europe in the mid-1800s, and through mass production methods became widely distributed in the United States by the 1880s. By the latter half of the 19th century, many towns had their own resident stereograph photographer, which means there were plenty of local subjects available for people with stereoscopes to go with their more exotic images. Stereographs reached their peak of popular distribution in the years 1902-1935 through the business efforts of such companies as the Keystone View Company and Underwood & Underwood.

Underwood & Underwood was established at Ottawa, Kansas in 1882. They eventually moved to New York City in 1891. They originally operated as distributors of stereocards of Eastern views to new markets in the West. In 1895 they began producing packaged sets of views with descriptions earmarked for the education market. The Keystone View Co. was formed in 1892 in Meadville, Penn. by B.L. Singley, a former salesman at Underwood & Underwood. This company became the major publisher of stereographs in the world after 1920. In 1898 they organized their highly successful Education Department which produced boxed sets for school instruction of images and descriptive text illustrating culture, industry, commerce and politics world-wide. Although the company hired its own professional photographers, they also purchased rights to other negatives including several series of Underwood and Underwood negatives in 1912. Orders for Keystone sets continued to be filled by the company as late as 1970.

Scope and contents

The collection comprises stereograph cards and a stereoscope. The cards are of scenic and historic places from all over the United States, including New York City, Niagara Falls, the White House and the mausoleum of President McKinley. They include photographs of the military parade which took place in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania in 1887 to celebrate the centennial of the U.S. constitution (for information on the celebration see <https://archive.org/stream/historyofcelebra02carsrich#page/n347/mode/2up>). One interesting group is of Hot Springs, Arkansas, taken in 1886, while another documents the Mississippi River near Memphis around 1880. There are also cards which were produced for entertainment, either showing comic scenes or melodramas.

The Mississippi River side-wheel packet "Thompson Dean", the second steamer of that name, was built in Cincinnati in 1872. Named for one of the boat's owners, the "Thompson Dean" cost $180,000 to build and furnish. Considered one of the finest steamboats of its day, it received a gold medal at the Cincinnati Industrial Exposition. During the winter months, the "Thompson Dean" ran between St. Louis and New Orleans, while the rest of the year it traveled between Cincinnati and New Orleans. In 1882, the boat's cabin and engines were transferred to a new hull, and it became the side-wheel packet "Will S. Hays".
