Biographical information

Charles F. Heartman (1883-1953) was a German émigré who began collecting books at an early age and, as an adult, became a book dealer, editor, and publisher. He owned book stores in New York and later moved to New Jersey where he hosted book auctions at his home. Heartman edited the magazines The American Collector and The American Book Collector, published bibliographies and reprints as part of his Heartman Historical Series, and produced catalogs for his auctions and mail-order business. He developed an interest in African Americana and built an important collection of documents, pamphlets and other materials, parts of which are now preserved in academic libraries at Xavier University and Texas Southern.

In 1935, Heartman relocated with his wife and daughter to New Orleans, Louisiana. It was during this time that Heartman decided to act on an idea that had been on his mind for many years. He wanted to create a Utopian colony comprised of artists and intellectuals and placed an ad in one of his magazines inviting participation. Heartman purchased land in 1936 near Hattiesburg, Mississippi, situated about 100 miles north of New Orleans, and called the 400-acre area The Book Farm. He described the farm as having living quarters for the Heartmans, several buildings, a brook and a swimming hole, pecan trees, and its own power plant; 100 acres were already under cultivation. Although there were a number of applications, the required investment of $1000 was too much and the colony never materialized.

Heartman continued living and working in Mississippi publishing catalogs, bibliographies, reprints and checklists and incorporated into his imprint The Book Farm, Hattiesburg, Mississippi from 1936 to 1945. He and his wife relocated to The Beauvoir Community in Biloxi, Mississippi, in 1945. The last imprints with The Book Farm designation were published in New Braunfels, Texas, from 1947 until 1951, when the Heartmans returned to New Orleans and started The Southern Library Service. Heartman died in 1953.
